

INDEAVOR

8 Signs of a Toxic Work Environment

Guide

Intro

A toxic work environment rarely announces itself. It builds slowly through communication gaps, quiet distrust, and a steady drain on morale. By the time leadership notices, the damage to engagement and retention is already done.

The scale of the problem is hard to ignore. According to Gallup's State of the Global Workplace report, only 20% of employees globally are engaged at work. Another 64% are not engaged, and 16% are actively disengaged.

That means most employees work in environments missing the support, structure, and culture they need to thrive. The eight signs below are consistent across organizations and industries. Spotting them early is the first step toward fixing them.

INDEAVOR

#01 POOR COMMUNICATION

When leadership fails to communicate clearly or consistently, employees are left guessing about priorities, expectations, and decisions. That uncertainty fills with rumors, misalignment, and frustration.

In shift-based operations, the effect compounds. Updates that reach one crew never reach the next, and schedule changes arrive late or not at all.

What to watch for:

- Employees learn about decisions secondhand or after the fact
- Priorities shift without explanation
- Rumors spread faster than official updates
- Different shifts or teams get different versions of the same information

A LACK OF TRUST #02

Poor communication and distrust feed each other. Over time, employees come to feel their opinions do not count, which Gallup identifies as a critical driver of disengagement.

Once trust erodes, collaboration breaks down. People stop speaking up, stop sharing ideas, and start protecting themselves instead of helping the team.

What to watch for:

- Meetings are quiet, and real conversations happen afterward
- Employees hesitate to raise safety, quality, or staffing concerns
- Decisions like shift assignments or overtime feel arbitrary or favor certain people
- Feedback flows down but rarely up

#03 HIGH TURNOVER

When employees leave frequently, it is usually a symptom of deeper cultural problems. Gallup research shows 51% of employees are actively watching for or seeking a new job.

Every departure restarts the hiring and training cycle. Remaining employees absorb the extra work, which pushes more of them toward the exit. Learn more about how to reduce employee turnover.

What to watch for:

- Open positions stay open, or refill and empty again
- Experienced employees leave without a clear reason
- Exit interviews point to the same managers, teams, or shifts
- Constant hiring strains both budgets and training resources

LOW MORALE AND DISENGAGEMENT #04

Not every unhappy employee resigns. Many mentally check out long before they leave, or never leave at all. Like a slow leak in a tire, disengagement often goes unnoticed until the whole team stalls out.

As morale drops, productivity follows. Work gets done to the minimum standard, and discretionary effort disappears.

What to watch for:

- Employees do what is required and nothing more
- Absenteeism and last-minute call offs rise
- Energy and enthusiasm fade, even among former top performers
- Cynicism replaces problem-solving in team conversations

INDEAVOR

#05 LITTLE PRAISE OR FEEDBACK

Toxic environments often fail to recognize contributions or provide meaningful feedback. Employees who never hear what they did well, or how to improve, start to feel undervalued.

Without recognition, motivation fades. Employees struggle to see how their work matters, and the effort they once gave freely starts to feel pointless.

What to watch for:

- Feedback only arrives when something goes wrong
- Extra effort, like covering open shifts, goes unacknowledged
- Performance conversations are rare, vague, or skipped entirely
- Credit for team wins goes to a few people at the top

INDEAVOR

POOR WORK-LIFE BALANCE #06

Unpredictable schedules, last-minute changes, and unsustainable workloads leave employees with little control over their time. Personal plans become impossible to make and keep.

The result is burnout. In frontline industries, exhausted employees are also a safety and quality risk, not just a retention one.

What to watch for:

- Schedules are posted late or change with little notice
- The same employees are repeatedly asked to cover extra shifts
- Overtime is constant rather than occasional
- Time off requests are hard to get approved or frequently revoked

INDEAVOR

#07 A LACK OF ACCOUNTABILITY

Unclear expectations and uneven enforcement allow some behaviors to go unchecked. When rules apply to some employees but not others, resentment builds quickly.

A lack of accountability also reinforces every other sign on this list. Problems with communication, workload, and fairness persist because no one owns fixing them.

What to watch for:

- Policies like attendance rules are enforced inconsistently
- Poor behavior from high performers or managers is overlooked
- Mistakes lead to blame rather than solutions
- No one can say who is responsible for a decision or outcome

INDEAVOR

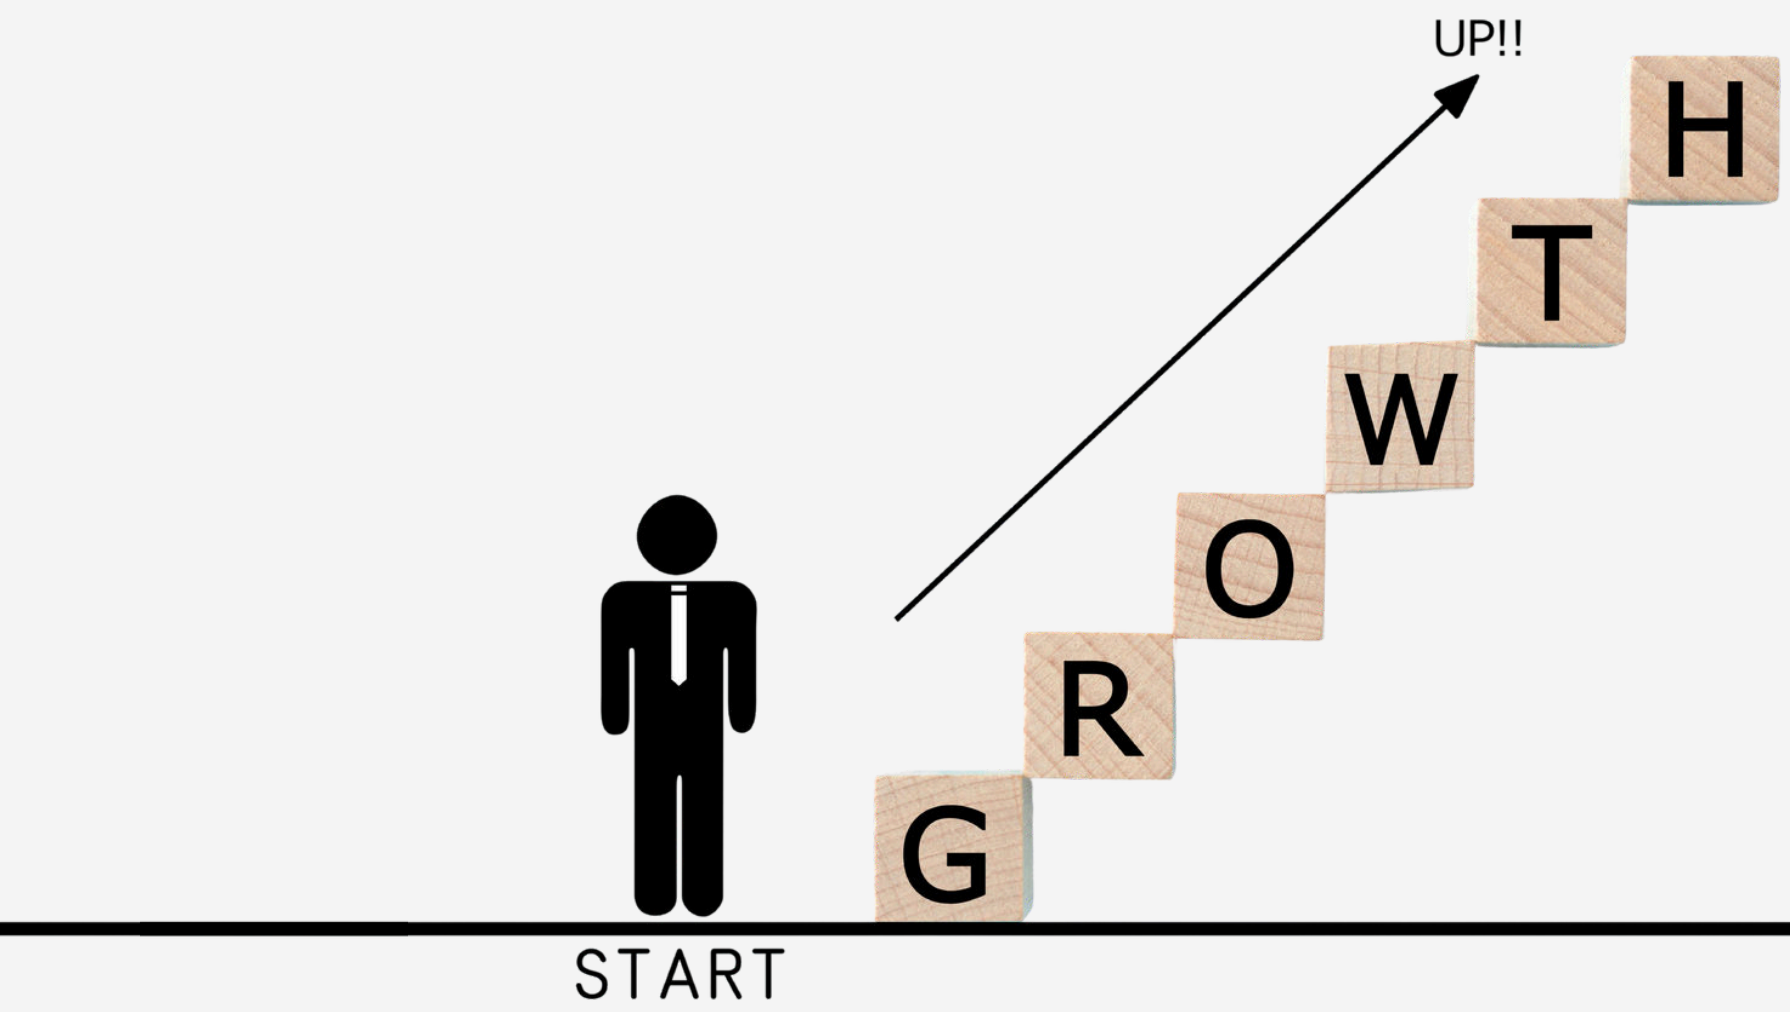
LIMITED GROWTH OPPORTUNITIES #08

Employees want to know where their careers are headed. When there is no visible path forward, even top talent begins to disengage and consider leaving.

Growth does not always mean promotion. It can mean new skills, cross-training, certifications, or a fair shot at preferred jobs and shifts.

What to watch for:

- Promotions and preferred assignments seem to go to the same few people
- Training and certification opportunities are scarce or unevenly offered
- Employees cannot describe what it takes to advance
- Ambitious employees leave for roles they could have filled internally



INDEAVOR

Start Fixing Your Toxic Work Environment

Addressing a toxic work environment does not require sweeping changes all at once. Meaningful progress often begins with the everyday employee experience.

For organizations that rely on shift work, scheduling is one of the most overlooked levers. Unpredictable or unfair scheduling amplifies poor communication, burnout, and distrust. Consistent, transparent schedules have the opposite effect.

When employees know what to expect and have some control over their time, stress decreases and engagement improves.

INDEAVOR

Rebuild Trust Before It's Too Late

A toxic work environment does not fix itself, and ignoring the warning signs only makes it worse. Recognizing these eight patterns is the first step.

The next step is practical action. Start with the daily experiences that shape how employees feel about their work, including how their time is scheduled. From there, organizations can rebuild trust, improve engagement, and create a workplace where employees do their best work.

Indeavor helps organizations build optimized, fair, and transparent schedules. Teams gain clearer visibility into their work, and managers align staffing with actual demand. Employees feel more respected in their day-to-day experience.

These changes may look operational on the surface. In practice, they directly influence morale, retention, and overall culture.

INDEAVOR

Conclusion

#01 — Poor communication is one of the most common signs of a toxic work environment

#02 — A lack of trust takes hold when employees stop believing leadership will act in their interest

#03 — Hight turnover is a clear sign that something in the work environment is driving employees away

#04 — Low morale and disengagement are often the quietest signs of a toxic work environment

#05 — Little praise or feedback leaves employees unsure whether their work is valued at all

#06 — Poor work-life balance signals that workloads and schedules are unsustainable

#07 — A lack of accountability lets toxic behaviors spread without consequence

#08 — Limited growth opportunities push employees to look elsewhere for their next step

INDEAVOR

Plan. Schedule. Engage. Optimize.

The Modern People Operations Platform for Manufacturing, Consumer Products, Energy and Public Enterprises.

www.indeavor.com

